I've had one of those consumer weather stations for many years but in the last year it started to fall apart and then stopped working completely. There were two reasons Why I hesitated about Netatmo. Setting up weather stations is a nightmare for the un-DIY type like me. For some reason, I thought the main module was about the size of the original Amazon Echo and the same outdoor module, but a little shorter. Where to put them? How to assemble them? I laughed when I opened the box. The outdoor module is a similar length and slightly thicker than a Smarties tube. The internal module on the thickness of those Smartie Christmas tubes, but half the length. And both incredibly light. It was a few minutes' work to put a screw under the eaves of my veranda and simply hang the module outdoors (and perfect for being away from the rain and sunshine). The internal module is small enough to be discreet. I had no problem setting it up, and the Android app, up. And this app is very well done, in my opinion. Instant information, graphics for everything with minimal presses of fingers, but beautifully clear and zoomable in and out. And the app also works well on my Android tablet. The temperature measurements are in place and the barometer pressure agrees with the only remaining part of my old weather station. I also bought the rain guage, it is worth having in my opinion. This was equally easy to assemble thanks to a standard tripod mount at the bottom (I used one of those Gorilla-type mounts to wrap it around the top of a truss in my garden). I love that you can plug in netatmo outdoor stations all over the world - I have some marked as Favorites that are close to friends' homes all over Europe. I also like measuring for air quality, something I've never had before that caused me to open windows more often to improve it – and decided I'd get another internal module to my room. I don't have - and I won't get - the wind station. This really needs to be mounted on a roof and although I liked having my previous one (on the wall of a garden) it was so hopelessly inaccurate because of obstacles and houses around that I knew it would be a waste of money. Because the only thing I'm slightly critical of with this Netatmo kit is value for money. This thing seems a little too expensive for what it is, but that's my only complaint. And netatmo stuff appears regularly on Amazon Deals (I've been thinking about one for about 2 years, so I've been watching). I have read many reports on the reliability of the Outdoor. They're worried, but I don't have enough time to comment in person. I had no problem in the few weeks I had it. If you're the smallest nerd of the time, you're going to like this.
